

Audubon Connections

Bird conservation has long been the hallmark of the Audubon movement. Today, Audubon organizations tackle a wide range of environmental issues and spearhead a variety of bird protection strategies.

Audubon International encourages its program members in 49 U.S. states and two dozen other countries to work cooperatively with local conservation organizations that can provide local assistance for environmental stewardship activities. More than 500 conservation organizations, including representatives from cooperative extension services, native plant organizations, parks, water management districts, and wildlife organizations, are directly involved with Audubon Cooperative Sanctuary and Audubon Signature Program members. In addition, many Audubon chapters and state-based Audubon societies have generously volunteered their time to assist members in developing bird inventories, monitoring nest boxes, and improving habitat for birds and other wildlife.

We extend our thanks to the following Audubon organizations for their assistance in helping people protect and sustain the land, water, wildlife, and natural resources around them.*

There are more than 500 Audubon Societies in the United States. Each of these groups is independent and separately incorporated, and each is free to establish its own goals, develop its own programs, and take positions regarding environmental issues. The Audubon Society of New York State is a not-for-profit, 501(c)(3) environmental education organization working in New York State, and doing business as Audubon International because its programs extend throughout the U. S. and to many other countries. It is not affiliated with the National Audubon Society.
